Advancing Religion and Development as a Transdisciplinary Research Field

What role does religion play in international development research and practice? The “turn to religion” thesis describes a markedly increased interest in religion in development research, policy, and practice. The lecture critically examines this thesis and asks what it means to understand Religion and Development (RaD) as a transdisciplinary field. It also introduces the book project The Elgar Companion to Religion and International Development – a current undertaking that brings the field up to date and opens new thematic, epistemological, and methodological pathways, including multireligious perspectives as well as voices from the Global South and North, bringing them into dialogue.
